

No Pain Please

Does a human being have the right to invade another person's intimacy.

The one word is no! However lets analyse the statement.

Human beings have rights. For example they should have the right to freedom of speech. Sadly there are situations in which we are encouraged not to speak or are limited in what we can say.

Another right is to have privacy in our homes. First of all you need to have a home and have understanding neighbours. The threat nowadays comes from technology and artificial intelligence. We may believe we are not being observed, but there maybe hidden chips or cameras.

What could the justifications be for a human being to be monitored by another individual? Firstly they must have either committed a crime or given their consent.

If they are being monitored for legal reasons, they should at least be informed, and there must be a precise protocol to prevent abuse.

If they have given their free consent, one has to assume that they trust the person monitoring their actions.

Human being require both physical and mental privacy. Those who have been subject to abuse know how upsetting this can be.

We can accept that people have more privileges than us, but we all surely have the right to be pain free from other human being's irresponsible actions.

Technology isso advanced that that our bodily functions can both be monitored and altered remotely. Therefore, the individuals who have the ability to do this must undergo security and psychology screening to ensure safety and also guarantee the ethical usage.

The main concern is that modern technology can erode our intimacy. We are adaptable creatures, so positive interactions are welcome, but we must not create traumas due to bad development and be practice.

The worst feeling is to be invaded by another human being no matter the reasons or circumstances - responsible use of mental capabilities, bodies and technology please!
